Excerpt: . . . and they will naturally give it to those who make them the finest promises, those who flatter them the most. But in the end the veil falls from their eyes, and they will demand something more solid than the right of agreeing by their vote in the province, and in the parish, to elect you into the Chambers, a worthless right, which does not prevent their paying taxes on their property, on their consumption, and, above all, the tax on blood so heavy on the poor! They will require something more solid; and that something, is a share in the wealth which you enjoy so largely. You have established, say you, the rule of equality! But are the people more happy for it! To judge by their complaints they are much less so. This is what the new doctors repeat to them, and experience shows...
